Docket No. NPRM FAA-2020-0686
Product Identifier 2019-NM-035-AD; RIN 2120-AA64
The Boeing Company Model 737-8 and 737-9 ("737 MAX") Airplanes

Comment:

The families of Ethiopian Airlines Flight 302 (ET302) victims oppose the proposed rule and recertification of the 737 MAX because the airplane is aerodynamically unstable and does not comply with modern aircraft certification standards. The Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) has not revealed to the public the data supporting its determination that the changes mandated by the Airworthiness Directive (AD) would ensure that the 737 MAX is safe to fly, and the proposed AD leaves unanswered critical questions regarding the airplane's safety. Accordingly, we strongly urge the FAA to address the following actions before moving forward with the proposed AD and returning 737 MAX to service:

- Conduct a complete aerodynamic evaluation of the 737 MAX in order to understand and mitigate the airplane's dangerous pitch-up tendency;
- Reject the proposed 737 MAX "MCAS fix" as insufficient because the software modification does not address the underlying aerodynamic problem, introduces greater complexity, and may create additional failure modes and other dangers;
- Disclose to the public the data relied upon by the FAA to determine that the 737 MAX has safe stall characteristics even without a functioning MCAS;
- If the airplane's pitch-up tendency cannot be mitigated through an aerodynamic fix, require that Boeing integrate a state-of-the-art triple redundancy Angle of Attack (AOA) sensor system on the 737 MAX;
- Simplify the Crew Alert System on the 737 MAX so that flight crews are not overwhelmed by multiple warning systems;
- Commission a new independent review board to assess the 737 MAX's safety and consider the board's findings before returning the 737 MAX to service; and
- Reconvene the Boeing 737 MAX Flight Control System Joint Authorities Technical Review (JATR) for the purpose of developing international consensus on the ability of the proposed design changes to assure the safety of the 737 MAX.

A. Background

Defects in the Boeing 737 MAX took 346 lives before the FAA finally grounded the airplane. The changes identified in the FAA's Notice for Proposed Rule Making are insufficient to make the airplane safe. The FAA should not allow the 737 MAX to return to service until all of the airplane's deficiencies are addressed and it undergoes transparent and independent safety reviews.

We are a group of spouses, children, parents, grandparents and siblings whose family members perished in the crash of ET302 on March 10, 2019. Supporting us in this effort are many friends of our lost loved ones. We are issuing this comment to express our profound disagreement with the AD proposed by the FAA for the Boeing 737 MAX. The proposed AD contains a number of shortcomings and omits critical safety improvements that must be implemented prior to FAA recertification of the 737 MAX.

The ET302 and Lion Air Flight 610 (JT610) crashes were caused by deadly design defects in the 737 MAX's Maneuvering Characteristics Augmentation System (MCAS). In both crashes the single point failure of a faulty AOA sensor triggered MCAS to command repeated nose down trim, causing the airplanes to enter unrecoverable dives. In developing MCAS to overcome the dangerous pitch instability of the 737 MAX, Boeing took shortcuts in the design process, ignored fundamental design principles, and failed to perform proper system safety assessments and functional hazard analyses. Boeing purposefully concealed the very existence of MCAS from its airline customers and 737 MAX pilots in order to avoid the costs associated with additional pilot training. Worse still, as a result of competitive pressures and a corporate culture encouraging profits over safety, Boeing hid the MCAS's ability to override and overpower pilot commands from the FAA and misled the FAA about associated risk factors in order to quickly obtain certification for the airplane and avoid pilot training requirements due to the presence of MCAS.

The pain of our loss is compounded by the reality that the 737 MAX tragedies were entirely preventable. During the airplane's development, Boeing engineers identified the exact defect that would later cause the two crashes but decided that it was not necessary to change the design to eliminate the system's risks. Boeing then resisted grounding the 737 MAX even after the airplane's defects caused the JT610 crash that took 189 lives on October 29, 2018. Boeing's denials continued even after the defects in the 737 MAX caused the ET302 crash, costing another 157 precious lives and prompting a worldwide ban of the airplane. As recently as May 2020, top Boeing officials denied making any mistakes in the design and manufacture of the 737 MAX. Boeing executive Keith Leverkuhn, the former Vice President and General Manager of the MAX program, told Congress behind closed doors that the development of the 737 MAX was "correct and appropriate<sup>1</sup>." Michael Teal, another Boeing executive, agreed with Mr. Leverkuhn, and also testified that he signed off on the MCAS without even knowing that the system was capable of commanding repeated cycles of nose-down trim based on the erroneous input from a single AOA sensor<sup>2</sup>.

Boeing repeatedly misled the FAA about the safety of the 737 MAX, and it never should have been allowed to fly in its original state. The modifications proposed by the FAA fail to inspire confidence that the revised 737 MAX airplane will be safe. To the contrary, the proposed AD makes clear that the FAA is focused primarily on helping Boeing get the 737 MAX back in the air rather than on ensuring the safety of the airplane.

B. The proposed Airworthiness Directive is inadequate.

The proposed AD would require four design changes to the 737 MAX: 1) installing updated flight control software to prevent erroneous MCAS activation; 2) installing updated software to generate an AOA Disagree Alert to flag pilots to a potential AOA sensor failure; 3) revising certain flight crew operating procedures to ensure that pilots have the means to recognize and respond to AOA sensor failure and undesired stabilizer movement; and 4) changing the routing of horizontal stabilizer trim wires to restore compliance with FAA wire separation safety standards.

These changes are insufficient to guarantee the safety of the airplane.<sup>3</sup> Moreover, the software updates and revised procedures are no more than a mitigation strategy, because they fail to address the root cause of the problem: the 737 MAX's inherent aerodynamic instability.

C. The proposed fixes do not address the 737 MAX's structural flaws

Boeing developed the 737 MAX to compete with the A320neo, a new fuel-efficient single aisle airplane produced by Airbus. Under the threat of losing market share to its European rival, Boeing decided to design the 737 MAX as a minimally-changed derivative of the Boeing 737 Next Generation (737NG) rather than design a new airplane. Boeing adopted this strategy to save the company development time and costs, and to expedite FAA certification. The primary difference between the 737NG and the 737 MAX was the incorporation of the 737 MAX's large LEAP-1B engines, which had to be mounted higher and farther forward on the wings to fit the 737's airframe. Early in development, Boeing discovered that the 737 MAX had a tendency to pitch up in certain stages of flight as a result of the size and positioning of the plane's engines. Discovering aerodynamic problems of this nature is not uncommon during airplane development and manufacturers usually address these types of problems by incorporating structural or aerodynamic components that can passively counter the pitch-up force or reduce it. But Boeing made only minor physical changes to the 737 MAX's airframe, deciding instead to solve the airplane's aerodynamic problem primarily with software.

Boeing quietly developed MCAS, a computer control law programmed into the 737 MAX's flight control computers, to address the pitch-up problem. MCAS automatically pushes the airplane's nose down by moving the 737 MAX's horizontal stabilizer if one of the airplane's two AOA sensors indicates that the airplane's upward pitch angle is too high. Boeing designed <sup>3</sup>The rerouting of horizontal stabilizer trim wires has no relation to the crashes of ET302 or JT610 and should not be construed as a corrective action towards the causation of these two events.

MCAS so that after it completes a nose-down trim cycle or the pilots countermand the MCAS nose-down trim by using the electric trim switches to bring the nose back up, MCAS reengages after five seconds and commands another nose-down trim cycle if the AOA value supplied by a single AOA sensor remains above the MCAS trigger threshold. Boeing determined that without MCAS, the 737 MAX would not comply with FAA safety requirements concerning aerodynamic stability and would not be certifiable.

Boeing also knew that if it presented MCAS as a new system, it might be subjected to enhanced regulatory scrutiny and the potential for increased pilot training requirements. A key element to Boeing's marketing strategy for the 737 MAX was to sell its airline customers on the idea that 737NG pilots would be able to transition seamlessly to the 737 MAX with little training and without the need for a new type rating. Without this selling point, Boeing knew that its business would suffer. So, Boeing cleverly portrayed MCAS to the FAA as a mere extension of the Speed Trim System (STS), an existing system in the 737NG. Boeing told the FAA that MCAS was "transparent" to pilots and only activated far outside normal flight conditions.<sup>4</sup> The misleading strategy of branding MCAS as an additional function under the STS worked. The FAA granted Boeing an Amended Type Certificate, agreed to remove all references to MCAS from the operational and training materials, and approved a two-hour computer-based pilot training course that did not even mention MCAS, rather than mandating more rigorous simulator training. The FAA continues to describe MCAS as part of the 737 MAX's STS, even though Boeing has released documents demonstrating that it was a Boeing strategy to brand MCAS as part of the STS to avoid FAA scrutiny.

The FAA certified the 737 MAX under false pretenses, because the system safety information Boeing provided to the FAA during the certification process grossly understated MCAS's actual power and operational envelope. Initially, Boeing restricted MCAS to high speed and high AOA operation – flight conditions that pilots would only rarely, if ever, encounter – and limited MCAS's authority to move the horizontal stabilizer to push the airplane's nose down a mere 0.6 degrees per activation. But in 2016, after the safety of MCAS had already been analyzed, Boeing substantially augmented the system's capabilities, expanding MCAS to lower flight speeds and dramatically increasing its authority to a powerful 2.5 degrees per activation. Boeing did not inform the FAA of these changes in order to surreptitiously advance its marketing strategy of minimizing pilot training for competitive advantage. Boeing expanded MCAS after determining in flight testing that the 737 MAX did not have safe flaps up stall characteristics and that without MCAS augmentation, the 737 MAX would be uncertifiable. The expansion of MCAS was necessary to save the 737 MAX at a point when Boeing had already invested a tremendous amount of time and money into the project. A physical fix would cause higher costs to Boeing, unacceptable production delays, enhanced FAA scrutiny of the airplane's design, and additional pilot training requirements.

But MCAS was not a fail-safe design. Because Boeing misled the FAA on MCAS's capabilities so significantly, the system was permitted to rely on data from just one of the airplane's two AOA sensors, making the 737 MAX vulnerable to unwanted MCAS activation in the event of erroneous data supplied by a single faulty AOA sensor. Boeing's withholding of critical safety information from the FAA resulted in FAA certification of a system susceptible to single point failure. Indeed, in both JT610 and ET302, the airplanes' second AOA sensor produced accurate AOA values, but the MCAS did not have access to this accurate data because only one sensor was being used. To address this problem, the FAA's proposed AD requires MCAS to compare data from two AOA sensors rather than one. This is not an adequate solution, because in the event of a disagreement, the flight control computer will shut down MCAS. This begs the questions:

<sup>4</sup> MCAS was not developed as an extension of the Speed Trim System. MCAS performs a different function than the Speed Trim System and has different risks and failure modes. Boeing merely branded the MCAS as part of the Speed Trim System to avoid FAA scrutiny.

- If the FAA has determined that it is acceptable for MCAS to shut off in the event of an AOA disagreement, and pilots can safely fly the aircraft without MCAS, then why was MCAS needed in the first place?
- If Boeing developed MCAS to address specific performance deficiencies in the 737 MAX, and the system will now shut down whenever there is a disagreement between AOA sensors, then how will those deficiencies be addressed?

Boeing determined that the 737 MAX was unsafe without MCAS and expanded MCAS to engage at lower speeds and at all loads because it determined that the 737 MAX's flaps-up stall characteristics were uncertifiable. This is wholly inconsistent with the FAA's current position, that the 737 MAX's "basic airplane stall characteristics comply, both with and without STS/MCAS operation<sup>5</sup>." As part of its strategy to get the 737 MAX flying again, the FAA is downplaying the need for MCAS, implying that the system is not necessary for safe operation of the 737 MAX, and claiming that the 737 MAX has safe stall characteristics even without a functioning MCAS. We must therefore ask:

- If MCAS is not needed to improve the flaps up stall characteristics of the 737 MAX, then did Boeing make a terrible mistake in expanding it to improve those characteristics and to help with stall identification?
- Did Boeing cause two plane crashes because it was wrong about the 737 MAX's stall characteristics?

Despite portraying the 737 MAX as airworthy for stall characteristics without MCAS, the FAA has refused to reveal to the public the data that verifies this finding, notwithstanding that such data is essential to the 737 MAX's return to service. The FAA cannot unground the plane while keeping secret protocols, test results and other key data. If the FAA relies upon certain data to propose a rule, the FAA should be ethically bound to disclose that data to the public, who can then choose to comment with full information. The FAA should not base the 737 MAX's return to service on data that the FAA refuses to disclose.

We believe that the 737 MAX should not be ungrounded unless the airplane's aerodynamic flaws have been addressed and the airplane can be certificated to fly without MCAS. Should this not be feasible, the plane must, at minimum, be equipped with a third active AOA sensor and associated software to allow the 737 MAX's systems to determine that a sensor failure has occurred or that AOA data is erroneous. Using two sensors means that the system cannot guarantee which one is correct, increasing the potential that an erroneous AOA will make MCAS unavailable and expose flights to the aerodynamic deficiencies that required MCAS in the first place. For these reasons, if the MCAS is to be retained as the means of ensuring aerodynamic stability, it must be redesigned with triple redundancy, as exists for most other modern aircraft. Three AOA sensors will increase the integrity of the MCAS system because it will not be vulnerable to a single point failure.

The proposed software fixes to the 737 MAX add more complexity, more lines of code, and potentially new failure modes, which may result in a higher probability of failure. This is the opposite of the approach a manufacturer should take in addressing a complex issue. Certificated airplanes should be safe to fly without extreme software enhancements, but because the 737 MAX was approved under an Amended Type Certificate, it did not have to meet the most recent aviation safety standards for design. The root problem with the 737 MAX is fundamentally aerodynamic and resides in the flawed interface between the wings, fuselage and engines, and any real safety fix should involve structural changes that will render MCAS unnecessary for the safety of the airplane.

D. The proposed AD does not adequately address the cascading flight deck effects of erroneous AOA data.

The proposed AD fails to address a critical hazard that contributed to the crashes of JT610 and ET302: the series of cascading flight deck alerts that confused and overwhelmed the flight crews, delaying their recognition of the failed sensor and its effects – thereby sealing their fates. Pilots rely upon crew alerting systems, which are mandatory in all modern aircraft under 14 CFR Part 25.1302. But the 737 MAX was approved under an Amended Type Certificate, so Boeing was able to avoid equipping the 737 MAX with current mandatory alerting systems.

When Boeing develops a new airplane, it is required to conduct safety assessments to ensure that all combinations of failures that could lead to hazardous or catastrophic results have been considered and appropriately mitigated or, ideally, eliminated. During the development of the 737 MAX, Boeing tested the effects of uncommanded MCAS activation, but did not evaluate the risks presented by cascading flight deck alerts caused by an erroneous AOA reading, including the visual and audio effects generated by the IAS DISAGREE, ALT DISAGREE and Stall Warning alerts, among others. This evaluation was especially critical, because Boeing's test pilots concluded that a runaway trim at the MCAS high speed rate could present a catastrophic risk to the airplane (i.e., a plane crash) if pilots delayed their response time beyond 10 seconds. Boeing also failed to examine the hazard scenario of repeated MCAS activations based on erroneous AOA sensor values, despite recognizing this particular vulnerability of the system during development.

Boeing's simulator tests, intended to verify the safety of the MCAS, were wholly subjective and not based upon scientific methodology because they failed to properly consider real pilot response times, actual cockpit system indications, or anticipated emergent circumstances. As a result, the findings were meaningless because they did not simulate the real-life hazards that pilots would face in addressing an MCAS emergency triggered by an erroneous AOA.

During the 737 MAX certification process, Boeing convinced the FAA that it should not have to comply with every provision of 14 CFR Part 25.1322, concerning flight crew alerts, based on the FAA's "changed product rule," 14 CFR Part 21.101. This rule permits new versions of older model airplanes to be granted compliance exceptions during certification if the manufacturer can show that it would be "impractical" to comply with new regulations because the anticipated safety benefits do not justify the costs necessary to comply. Based on incomplete and misleading information, the FAA granted Boeing's request for an exception for the 737 MAX, allowing Boeing to circumvent 14 CFR Part 25.1322(b)(3), which requires advisory alerts "for conditions that require flight crew awareness and may require subsequent flight crew response"; 14 CFR Part 25.1322(c)(2), which mandates that warning and caution alerts "must provide timely attention-getting cues through at least two different senses by a combination of aural, visual, or tactile indications"; and 14 CFR Part 25.1322(d), which states that "the alert function must be designed to minimize the effects of false and nuisance alerts."

Additionally, the new 737 MAX design does not provide the flight crew with a simple indicator that the MCAS has been activated, nor does it give the flight crew the ability to disable the MCAS after receiving such a warning. Boeing is thus in violation of 14 CFR Part 25.1309, concerning equipment, systems, and installations, which mandates that "warning information must be provided to alert the crew to unsafe system operating conditions, and to enable them to take appropriate corrective action. Systems, controls, and associated monitoring and warning means must be designed to minimize crew errors which could create additional hazards."

Neither Boeing nor the FAA has provided information as to whether Boeing plans to modernize the 737 MAX's flight deck alerts to make a potential MCAS failure manageable for airline pilots faced with an unexpected emergency, rather than merely suitable for test pilots who know what is coming. Until this hazard has been properly evaluated and in some way mitigated, the 737 MAX should not be permitted to fly.

E. The 737 MAX must undergo meaningful independent review before recertification.

The FAA has been far from transparent regarding the 737 MAX, refusing to comply with its obligations under the Freedom of Information Act by failing to respond to requests from victims' families and in stonewalling Congress. Boeing and the FAA were responsible for the certification of the 737 MAX in a deeply corrupted review process. Boeing cannot be trusted to put safety first, and the FAA has not proven itself to be capable of acting as an independent reviewer of the airplane's safety. The FAA has not taken meaningful action to penalize Boeing for misleading the FAA, despite the public release of internal Boeing communications that revealed the utter contempt that Boeing employees had for the FAA.

Before the 737 MAX is recertified, the proposed fixes must be evaluated by a panel of qualified civil aviation manufacturing, design and maintenance experts with no ties to Boeing; for instance, a panel made up of widely-accepted civil transport aircraft experts who possess technical expertise and FAA regulatory and policy knowledge. It is the opinion of the ET302 families that some of the previous expert panels assembled to review the 737 MAX did not possess actual experience in civil transport aircraft manufacturing, design or maintenance, and their work output was unreliable. We also strongly recommend that the FAA reconvene the Boeing 737 MAX Flight Control System Joint Authorities Technical Review (JATR) for the purpose of developing international consensus on the ability of design changes to assure safety of the 737 MAX. These actions would go a long way in building confidence in the FAA's ultimate decision on the airplane.

F. The FAA must commission a safety review of other Boeing models.

The public disclosure of real-time communications exchanged between Boeing employees engaged in the development of the 737 MAX showed the world the attitude that Boeing has towards safety, the FAA, and the integrity of the certification process. The Boeing employees showed utter disdain for the FAA and saw no problem in gaming the certification process to achieve Boeing's program goals of attaining an Amended Type Certificate for the 737 MAX and avoiding simulator training for pilots transitioning from the 737NG. Boeing has publicly proclaimed that it followed the same processes in developing the 737 MAX that it follows in developing all of its models. This should compel the FAA to conduct a broad review of the safety of all Boeing airplanes. The certification process relies on trust, as earned by an applicant's performance and integrity, and the FAA relies on manufacturers to be honest and transparent on issues relating to safety. Boeing has shown that it is not worthy of the FAA's trust.

We particularly recommend that the FAA commission an independent review of the safety and certification of the Boeing 777X. Just as the 737 MAX was based on the original type certificate for the 737, the 777X was based on the original type certificate for the 777. By the time the 737 MAX began to encounter problems, design certification for the 777X was well underway at the FAA. A few months after the 737 MAX was grounded, Boeing experienced an explosive depressurization during fatigue testing for the 777X that caused the airplane's fuselage to split. The company downplayed the event significantly, said that it understood the problem, made repairs, and moved forward. But Boeing did all of this under its Organization Designation Authorization – the same way that it achieved an Amended Type Certificate for the 737 MAX. The 777X is presently in flight testing and is expected to enter commerce in 2022, which raises the question:

- Can the public trust Boeing's assurances that it addressed and mitigated the 777X's structural defects, given all of the revelations relating to the 737 MAX?

G. Conclusion

The FAA and Boeing must make significant changes to policy, procedure, and oversight in order to help systemically change the industry culture on safety. Safety must be the number one program goal in the manufacturer's design and production of any airplane and in its response to any identified defects. In the 737 MAX program, safety clearly was not Boeing's number one priority. Now, we believe that the FAA is more concerned with saving Boeing's investment in the 737 MAX than it is on ensuring that the airplane is safe. Rather than ungrounding the 737 MAX based on a recoded MCAS, the FAA should reevaluate the airplane as a whole and only permit it to fly if the FAA is completely satisfied that the 737 MAX is not a danger.

On behalf of our lost family members, we respectfully ask the FAA to take the actions set forth in full above before moving forward with the proposed rule and recertification of the 737 MAX.
